Save The Stems:

Did you know that overwintering habitat is one of the most important factors influencing local pollinator species? When cleaning up your yard in the fall, consider waiting until spring to cut back dead flower stems and seed heads. If this is not an option, consider saving woody stems to build a small pile in an out of the way location, such as behind a hedge or underneath evergreen trees.

Doing this creates habitat and overwintering homes for pollinators including the Mason, Leaf Cutter, and Wool Carder bees. Stems added to your pile should be at least partially hollow or come from plants with a woody pith and should be at least 18-20" long.
